Anything that can be done in Photoshop can be done in a GIMP workspace or from within many different graphics programs. Getting the Image Import Dialog As with any image editing software, the first step to any Photoshop editing is opening the image to be edited. Many images are stored in the default Photoshop.psd format. To open a file, choose File?Open. You see the Open dialog box (see Figure 2-2, left). Figure 2-2: You can open an image by choosing File?Open from within Photoshop. Depending on how your software was set up and/or how you have it set up, you may see quite a few different places to open an image. For example, in the figure on the left, you see three different ways to access the Open dialog. You can choose where to start a file by choosing from the Open With list in the Open dialog box. The most common is probably the Library icon. The next most common is the Recent Items icon, which looks like a folder or an open book. You may also have a separate folder containing the images for that software — often in a folder named Camera Roll — that you can access by the Camera Roll icon. You may also be able to open an image directly from a website by clicking a link that takes you directly to the image. (You can also type the URL of an image directly into the Open dialog box.) You can always access the Open dialog again by choosing File?Open again. If you want to find more than one image to open, you can do so by choosing Window?Windows and then clicking the Window drop-down list on the far right and then choosing Multiple Windows to display a list of images. Don't choose an image that you want to open and then resize the image by resizing it to see how the image will look when it's resized. Your editing skills don't make a good test of the new image before you open it. It's best to open an image in a new window for that purpose. (You can use the New Window button on the far left of the main image window.) You may even set your software so that it automatically opens a new image window when you load an image. In the window, you can resize it. If you like, you can immediately apply Photoshop's Align and Move buttons to help you decide how to frame the image

[Contrast-enhanced MR imaging of malignant bone tumors]. The spatial relationship between tumor necrosis and bone trabecula and the relationship between tumor cells and bone marrow are important for the staging of malignant bone tumors. This imaging modality allows the differentiation of benign and malignant lesions based on their vascularization. The principal problems of MRI are its low tissue contrast and the need for a contrast agent. GadoliniumDTPA (Gd-DTPA) is the most commonly used contrast agent for imaging of bone tumors. It causes an increase in tumor permeability and a decrease in bone permeability and is therefore optimal for imaging of the necrotic parts of the tumor and for differentiation from metastatic bone disease.Q: How to select closest and second closest div having same class for each I want to get the two divs having same class next to each other, for example: Lorem Ipsum Which are the second and second closest divs, to get the second value: var ipsum = document.querySelector('.ipsum-closeness'); This returns the first one: var ipsum = document.querySelector('.ipsum-closeness').firstElementChild; I know I can do this: var ipsum = document.querySelector('.ipsum-closeness').querySelector('#ipsum'); But this is not that efficient if there are a lot of such divs, as it might be hardcoded. What I want is something like this: var ipsum = document.querySelector('.ipsum-closeness').querySelector('.lorem-closeness', '#ipsum') So I can get the nearest second div from anywhere. A: You can use indexOf to get the second closest div having ipsum-closeness class: var query = document.querySelectorAll('.ipsum-closeness'); var i = 0; var ipsum = query[0].querySelector('#ipsum') console.log(ipsum);
